1. In late May the Chinese Communist 2 Air Squadron Headquarters was at Manyuan (116-24, 39-48) Airfield. The commander was CHANG Ta-hsiang (張大祥) and the deputy commander was a man named P'EI (裴). The code designation of this squadron was "906", and it was formerly known as the P'ohai (渤海) Unit.
2. Attached to this squadron at Manyuan Airfield are 12 Soviet pilots, 13 Soviet mechanics, 19 training planes, and a number of Soviet instructors. Approximately 200 Chinese Communist ground troops guard Manyuan Airfield.
3. In February construction was completed at a new airfield four miles from Manyuan. It is equipped with supply dumps, a hospital, a club house, and a cooperative store.

4. In mid-June Ssup'ingchieh Airfield, Manchuria, was being enlarged to cover an additional two square miles and new barracks were being constructed near the field. A Soviet tank company was stationed in the airfield area.
5. In early June work on a trench along the side of Swatow Airfield was completed. It is approximately one yard wide and parallels the runway, to which it is equal in length. A number of anti-aircraft guns in the southwest area of the field fired approximately 12 rounds at Nationalist planes which flew over Swatow Airfield in early June.
